BACKGROUND

- 15 Despite advances in technology, the process of finding and hiring employees is still time consuming and expensive. Because so much time and effort is involved, businesses find themselves devoting a considerable portion of their resources to the task of hiring. Some companies have entire departments devoted to finding new hires, and most have at least one person, such as a recruiter or hiring manager, who coordinates hiring efforts. Based on the resumes, some of applicants are chosen for interviews; based on the interviews, offers are extended to a select few. Resumes can be collected in a variety of ways. With recent advances in computer technology, it is commonplace to collect

- However, having so many choices can make it even more difficult to choose from among the applicants. A recruiter may be presented with hundreds of resumes in 30 response to a single job posting. Sifting through so many resumes to find those appropriate applicants for further investigation is not an easy task and cannot be easily
